

Longevity and Life Expansion: Modal Lifespan

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Life expansion may be described as a concept whereby the predicted lifespan of an individual is increased beyond the number of years people are currently living. According to Goodwin (2017), the maximum that a human being can live is about 120 years. Through technology, life expansion and longevity can be improved by applying scientific methods through thorough research on human genes that cause aging and finding solutions to age-related illnesses.

Societal influences and behavior also affect the longevity of human beings in numerous ways. People's lifestyle has been defined as a large contributor to an individual's life expectancy (Olshansky & Carnes, 2019). The discussion below analyzes longevity and its links with technology and society. Works done by other authors will shed more light on the topic by providing the current and past status of life expansion.

Definition and Its Link with Technology

Longevity is observed each time a person visits a hospital to seek treatment due to illnesses or injuries. Hospitals generally provide care and treatment to the sick and, therefore, are a way of lengthening an individual's life expectancy (Goodwin, 2017). Medical progress in a country can improve the lifespan of its citizens. Thus, advancement in medical capability using technology is one of the methods for increasing people's longevity.

History of Longevity

The history of longevity can be traced back to the 16th and 18th centuries, where people worked on ways to improve the vitality of the elderly in society to lengthen their life. From Hippocrates' time, there was a massive interest in increasing a human's lifespan, the general health of senior people, and the diseases affecting them (Van den Berg et al., 2019). Though many disregarded the concept of longevity, it received

A New Edition Mr. Pratt (Samuel Jackson), 1783 Essays on the Economics of Longevity Mayvis A. Rebeira, 2015

The dissertation focuses on the topic of longevity and aging specifically how changes in pension income and income inequality affect mortality and the risk factors associated with chronic health conditions Through three separate essays I examine the impact of the aforementioned factors on three disparate population cohorts in Canada the United States and in developed countries In the first essay I investigate risk factors for chronic physical and mental health conditions in an understudied group Canadian veterans My research helps identify high risk veterans as they transition from military to civilian life The findings show the importance of service oriented factors notably military branch land forces and overseas deployment as significant risk factors for a subset of chronic health conditions In addition veterans experienced improved health as their income levels increased In the second essay I investigate how differences in pension income affect mortality by analyzing pensions received by US Confederate veterans I exploit exogenous variation in pension income across two adjacent states Texas and Oklahoma as a result of regional differences in pension laws to determine the effect of pension income on health I compiled a novel database through primary data collection that details dates of birth and death of veterans I show that receiving higher pension increased longevity in Texan veterans by 1.23 years relative to their counterparts in Oklahoma The results remain significant after controlling for county level differences in the two states In the third essay I focus on the effect of macroeconomic conditions specifically income inequality on mortality risk for men and women in a subset of OECD countries from 1950-2008 Using the latest available data on the inverted Pareto Lorenz coefficient and a panel co integration framework I address econometric challenges e.g. causality omitted variable bias posed by more conventional methods I show that for industrialized countries with co integrated series income inequality has a long run significant negative effect on mortality risk for both men and women that is an increase in income inequality lowers annualized adult mortality risk These essays fill a major gap in the health economics literature on factors that affect health and longevity in understudied populations
