Fay is a man of age 34 who works for a construction company. He is a smoker. Being an unskilled laborer, he has been deployed in the housebuilding sector where he assists the masons in such activities as ferrying building stones and bricks to the site. It was noted that Fay becomes extremely worn out while executing the tasks. During the task, Fay makes a countless number of short calls and often takes water irrespective of the time of the day or the prevailing weather conditions.

Fay has impairments as his body functions are distorted. Once the human body develops diabetes, it follows that a person will regularly experience increased hunger, increased urination as well as an increased desire to take water (Beckles, 2008; White et al., 2010). Notably, Fay's participation is quite inappropriate as he experiences activity limitations and participation restrictions.

According to site managers, his participation is not adequate. His workmates are not aware of his condition and they often make fun of him whenever he makes short calls and demandingly seeks water. While sometimes he develops a violent nature against his workmates for making fun of him, he complains of being side-lined and therefore becomes depressed.

Intervention

The future of a diabetic person who has ignored medication is usually hit by serious complications (Egede et al., 2002; D'Antonio & Lewenson, 2010). If the condition is ignored, it follows that a person can also experience non-ending complications such as ketoacidosis, hypoglycaemia and hyperosmolar coma among other complications.

Fay is suffering from diabetes mellitus and as such, an intervention is required. According to medics, the best intervention for diabetes is Nursing Intervention. Nursing intervention can be described as actions that a nurse undertakes in an effort towards furthering treatment for a patient. The targeted ICF aspects include the development of the patient's participation (i.e. participation in activities to help in blood circulation and controlling the mood through engaging the patient in exciting events). In other words, nursing intervention helps improve environmental factors.
