Letters to My Child Jennifer L. Place,2011-11 This book began as a journal I wrote to my son The more I wrote the more I believed it could be viewed not only as a letter to my own son sharing my experiences and observations in life but also to share them with mothers of the world We are united in that same role no matter where you live your station in life your status in the community I think at our core we all want the same thing for our children we want a better life than what we had We want our children to have less pain less misfortune more wisdom and to grow up in a better world in general than we did What I began to write were things I wanted him to know as he grew older lessons on life and love But I also I wanted him to know that aside from being his mother I am also a real person I d like to be able to say when he gets older that my child had a glimpse into the person I was before he was born I hope that within these pages within these letters and lessons all mothers can find their voice speaking with me as they help to shape the future of their own children Jennifer L Place

Saint Gianna Beretta and Pietro Molla Elio Guerriero,2019-01-26 Between 1955 1962 Saint Gianna Beretta and her husband Pietro Molla corresponded through a series of letters collected here Touching inspiring and refreshingly human their exchanges reflect the everyday experiences and the abounding love of a modern day couple revealing that the way of holiness can unfold in the midst of this world From balancing work and family life to dealing with a long distance relationship to parenting to coping with illness and death Gianna and Pietro conquered it all But none of it was accomplished without tremendous trust in each other and in God Frontiers in the Acquisition of Literacy Claire M.

Fletcher-Flinn, 2015-09-28 Learning to read and to spell are two of the most important cultural skills that must be acquired by children and for that matter anyone learning a second language. We are not born with an innate ability to read. A reading system of mental representations that enables us to read must be formed in the brain. Learning to read in alphabetic orthographies is the acquisition of such a system which links mental representations of visual symbols (letters in print words) with pre-existing phonological sound and semantic comprehension cognitive systems for language. Although spelling draws on the same representational knowledge base and is usually correlated with reading, the acquisition processes involved are not quite the same. Spelling requires the sequential production of letters in words and at beginning levels there may not be a full degree of integration of phonology with its representation by the orthography. Reading, on the other hand, requires only the recognition of a word for pronunciation. Hence spelling is more difficult than reading and learning to spell may necessitate more complete representations or more conscious access to them. The learning processes that children use to acquire such cognitive systems in the brain and whether these same processes are universal across different languages and orthographies are central theoretical questions. Most children learn to read and spell their language at the same time; thus the coordination of these two facets of literacy acquisition needs explication as well as the effect of different teaching approaches on acquisition. Lack of progress in either reading and/or spelling is also a major issue of concern for parents and teachers, necessitating a cross-disciplinary approach to the problem encompassing major efforts from researchers in neuroscience, cognitive science, experimental psychology, and education. The purpose of this Research Topic is to summarize and review what has been accomplished so far and to further explore these general issues. Contributions from different perspectives are welcomed and could include theoretical, computational, and empirical works that focus on the acquisition of literacy, including cross-orthographic research.
