Measuring the Livability of an Urban Centre: An Exploratory Study of Key Performance Indicators

CARLOS J. L. BALSAS

Introduction

The purpose of this paper is to analyse the concept of 'city-centre livability' and to discuss how it may be measured. Although livability is a difficult concept to define and measure, its objective and rigorous quantification and qualification through a set of accepted key performance indicators (KPIs) is of critical relevance to those involved in the planning, programming and management of urban centres. Emphasis is given to North American and British KPIs.

Urban centres are important places in cities. They can be old historic districts or newer centralities, and they are characterised by a diversity of uses, such as retailing, housing, entertainment, and a mix of civic, administrative and professional services, among others. Very often, these centres experience boom and bust cycles, which negatively affect the livability of adjacent and older urban areas. These cycles are directly related to the economy as well as to the region's social, cultural, historical and political trends. Some examples include the wave of peripheral shopping centres, added personal mobility, suburbanisation, discount centres, malls, strip commercial areas, catalogue sales and online shopping.

In the urban regeneration literature, livability has come to mean the ability of a centre to maintain and improve its viability and vitality. These two terms mean the capacity of a city centre to attract investment continuously and to remain alive. These are desirable characteristics for urban regeneration initiatives. But, while considerable effort is put into devising regeneration plans and implementing them, the same is not true of monitoring and evaluating the outcomes of urban regeneration operations. With the exception of Tomalin (1997) and Hogg et al. (2001), there is little research on assessing the outcomes of city-centre revitalisation efforts and monitoring of progress. Pal & Sanders (1997) argue the same about measuring the effectiveness of town-centre management (TCM) schemes. In addition, there is no accepted method of evaluating regeneration efforts. It is not well known whether those efforts lead to long-term improvements in the vitality of downtown areas, because many programmes that appear successful in the short term are sometimes ineffective over the long term (Tyler, 1998).

This paper analyses the concept of 'city-centre livability' and how it can be measured through a set of KPIs. It emphasises North American and European KPIs, including population demographics, employment; retail vacancy, performance and sales; car parking; footfall; crime safety; cleanliness, tourism and evening economy. This paper is of interest to city and regional planners, city-centre managers, researchers and all those involved in urban regeneration activities.

The paper is divided into five parts. Follow-
