

The new technology

The information revolution is bringing new machines into common use and changing the way that familiar ones work and how you use them. Only a few years ago pocket calculators were expensive and much larger than they are now. Today they are small, slim, cheap and can do much more than just arithmetic - some tell the time, play tunes, work out bus routes, tell fortunes and can be programmed. Cassette recorders have been given a new use as data storage systems for home computers - themselves almost unheard of a few years ago. These changes are being brought about by microelectronics, especially the 'silicon chip', which makes machines more efficient, reliable and able to do more things.

New technology at work

The picture shows some of the new technology at work. The TV is showing a weather map of Europe made up from information from a weather satellite and sent out by videotele. The printer is wired into the phone network and is receiving electronic mail typed on a home computer keyboard, like the one shown here. With the addition of a device called a modem (see page 45) any computer can be turned into a communications terminal. The cassette machine is used for storing computer data and can contain a program to control the micro-robot. The video disc player has an interactive disc all along its length, so that you can turn the turntable and the telephone is programmed to pass any incoming calls to another number.

Information processing

Much information reaches you as words and pictures simply because this is the best way for your mind to understand it. Microelectronic machines deal with information in the form of electrical pulses. Any sort of information - letters and spoken words, pictures, measurements, sounds, even smells - can be turned into electrical pulses and 'understood' by a microchip. Information is already often stored and transmitted electronically. It then has to be processed by a machine into a form that people can understand, TV broadcasts or cassette tapes for example.

Computers are particularly good at processing information, and do it so fast that they have given us new ways of looking at it. The way that computers store and receive information is revolutionary too. A computer can look up the electronic equivalent of a whole library of books in a split second. The processing speed and fast access to information means that computers can calculate things that would be impossible for people to work out because it would take too long. Space travel, for example, would be impossible without computers. Even everyday things like driving a car can be greatly improved by microelectronics, as explained above.

Driving with new technology

Driving a car is a complex task which involves processing a lot of information from many sources - what is the best route to take, how to run the engine efficiently, should you turn the wipers and lights on, what speed can you go and so on. New technology can help with all these and more. To find the best route you could load a video map of the area, key in the place you want to go, tune the radio to pick up data on traffic conditions and then follow the arrows displayed on the screen by the dashboard computer, which is programmed to use all that information. It will also automatically control the motor, lights, wipers, speed, heaters and even things impossible to change now, like the suspension and aerodynamics. Speech synthesizer chips will remind you to fasten your seat belt or drive slower and even tell you when there is a fault and how to mend it. All of these features have been tested experimentally and some are even available now.

Intelligent machines

Machines that are controlled by microchips are sometimes referred to as 'smart' or 'intelligent'. This is because they seem to be responding to information in a clever way, doing different things in different situations. In fact, they are just following a set of instructions, called a program, electronically stored in a memory chip. The program says 'What happens... do that.' A camera, for example, may contain a program that tells it how to work out the correct exposure for the light level and film speed. It automatically responds to information coming from the light meter by adjusting the length of time that the shutter stays open. New technology machines are often much easier to use than the non-microchip kind.
