Evaluating Linkages Jocelyn A. Songco, 2016 What are the linkages between rural infrastructure investments and household welfare In the past most of the evaluations to assess the effectiveness of a project focused on physical outputs and success of project implementation In recent years more attention has been given to the impact of investments particularly its effect on the poor both in economic and noneconomic terms Songco presents findings from a survey of the existing literature on such impacts Although evidence exists for improved household welfare from rural infrastructure investment little evidence was found of studies that provided concrete linkages between specific investments in rural infrastructure and increased welfare of the rural poor This is due in part to the complexity and oftentimes the concurrent nature of interventions that make attributing welfare improvements to a particular project virtually impossible The evidence is presented in this three part paper Part I gives examples of past and current attempts to assess the impact of rural infrastructure projects and provides suggestions for future evaluations Part II discusses in detail some observed economic and noneconomic impacts on the poor from different rural infrastructure interventions Part III presents lessons learned from the literature on how to maximize the impact of rural infrastructure interventions on household welfare Specific project and country examples from the literature and new data from a recent qualitative study in Vietnam are presented as evidence for and illustration of key ideas and issues This paper a product of the Poverty Reduction and Economic Management Sector Unit East Asia and Pacific Region is part of a larger effort in the region to evaluate the welfare impact of investments The author may be contacted at jas494@columbia.edu
