

Schaeffer argues that in the modern period two important developments have affected our lives and, consequently, art as well. The first he calls a theological development: Christians have compartmentalized their lives into sacred and secular areas; the arts then are viewed as being secular and relegated to second-class importance. The second aspect, which happened concurrently, he calls a secular development: increasingly people have looked at themselves and their work in strictly utilitarian terms. Thus, art, having no immediate "relevance" to manufacturing cars or hair spray, is perceived as of peripheral importance. Schaeffer succinctly describes his view of the results: "The arts were particularly and bitterly affected, first relegated to the basement of the church as unspiritual and now, whenever they were allowed to see the light of day, demanded to make some useful contribution to that church" (pp. 31-32). The author's purpose, then, is to restore a holistic view, both of our position in the world (being created in God's image, we are of great intrinsic worth) and of our work ("all human endeavor is Christian [if it is not sin] and has its roots in God's good grace") (p. 47).

Addicted to Mediocrity is organized in two sections, the first being a general discussion of the issues, the second taking a question-and-answer format. The second appears to be a convenient excuse to include some items which the author could not conveniently incorporate in his essay. The first section is clearly the stronger one.

Schaeffer is witty, clever, and often biting in his satire. At times, though, he seems to dismiss with too cavalier an attitude those who have an inadequate understanding of and appreciation for the arts. In fact, one wonders whether some of those who should hear the message will not be miffed by the tone of the essay and refuse to read it; and those who will enjoy it probably agree already. Nonetheless, Schaeffer has an incisive word for evangelicals who are pious but artistically illiterate. His text is reinforced by Kurt Mitchell's clever lampooning drawings.

In his poem "Birches," Robert Frost celebrates the birch-swingers' quest toward heaven, while emphasizing to any eaves-dropping fate that he is certainly in no great hurry to go there. This popular conviction that "heaven can wait," surprisingly, is one of the few recurring questions which University of Illinois English professor Milo Kaufmann does not address in his Heaven: A Future Finer Than Dreams, which discusses "twenty of the most common questions about
