

The world is radically presupposed as forum by the philosopher as such. A forum is a place of assembly. A philosopher is one among other philosophers. Critical-rational discussion assumes a (normative) context of challenge and response. These voices articulate (characterize) this forum itself. Each describes the world. Note that denying the existence of such a world is absurdly an assertion about the very world one is (lost in confusion) trying to deny.

As philosophers (and not just gossiping drunks ) their enterprise is especially normative. The ontological is always also deontological. It is not essentially about what I believe but instead about what one ought to believe. All is this is implicit or enfolded in the notion(s) of the philosophical, the rational, the scientific.

Some prephilosophical blurry conception of philosophy is therefore always effective from the beginning, as a condition for the possibility of the performance, as its sense. Or, in other words, some prerational understanding of rationality itself is radically presupposed, just as the world is. Finally an inherently public and world-directed language is assumed. These claims are established by considering the absurdity in their attempted negation.
