Encyclopédie méthodique, 1782 Synthesis and transport properties of 2D transition metal carbides (MXenes) Joseph Halim, 2018-09-28 Since the isolation and characterization of graphene there has been a growing interest in 2D materials owing to their unique properties compared to their 3D counterparts Recently a family of 2D materials of early transition metal carbides and nitrides labelled MXenes has been discovered Ti_2CT_z $Ti_3C_2T_z$ $Mo_2TiC_2T_z$ Ti_3CNT_z $Ta_4C_3T_z$ $Ti_4N_3T_z$ among many others where T stands for surface terminating groups O OH and F MXenes are mostly produced by selectively etching A layers where A stands for group A elements mostly groups 13 and 14 from the MAX phases The latter are a family of layered ternary carbides and or nitrides and have a general formula of M_n1AX_n $n \geq 1$ 3 where M is a transition metal and X is carbon and or nitrogen The produced MXenes have a conductive carbide core and a non conductive O OH and or F terminated surface which allows them to work as electrodes for energy storage applications such as Li ion batteries and supercapacitors Prior to this work MXenes were produced in the form of flakes of lateral dimension of about 1 to 2 microns such dimensions and form are not suitable for electronic characterization and applications I have synthesized various MXenes $Ti_3C_2T_z$ Ti_2CT_z and Nb_2CT_z as epitaxial thin films a more suitable form for electronic and photonic applications These films were produced by HF NH_4HF_2 or LiF HCl etching of magnetron sputtered epitaxial Ti_3AlC_2 Ti_2AlC and Nb_2AlC thin films For transport properties of the Ti based MXenes Ti_2CT_z and $Ti_3C_2T_z$ changing n from 1 to 2 resulted in an increase in conductivity but had no effect on the transport mechanism i.e both Ti_3C_2Tx and Ti_2CTx were metallic In order to examine whether the electronic properties of MXenes differ when going from a few layers to a single flake similar to graphene the electrical characterization of a single $Ti_3C_2T_z$ flake with a lateral size of about 10 nm was performed These measurements the first for MXene demonstrated its metallic nature along with determining the nature of the charge carriers and their mobility This indicates that $Ti_3C_2T_z$ is inherently of 2D nature independent of the number of stacked layers unlike graphene where the electronic properties change based on the number of stacked layers Changing the transition metal from Ti to Nb viz comparing Ti_2CT_z and Nb_2CT_z thin films the electronic properties and electronic conduction mechanism differ

Ti₂CTz showed metallic like behavior resistivity increases with increasing temperature unlike Nb₂CTz where the conduction occurs via variable range hopping mechanism VRH where resistivity decreases with increasing temperature Furthermore these studies show the synthesis of pure Mo₂CTz in the form of single flakes and freestanding films made by filtering Mo₂CTz colloidal suspensions Electronic characterization of free standing films made from delaminated Mo₂CTz flakes was investigated showing that a VRH mechanism prevails at low temperatures 7 to 60 K Upon vacuum annealing the room temperature RT conductivity of Mo₂CTx increased by two orders of magnitude The conduction mechanism was concluded to be VRH most likely dominated by hopping within each flake Other Mo based MXenes Mo₂TiC₂Tz and Mo₂Ti₂C₃Tz showed VRH mechanism at low temperature However at higher temperatures up to RT the transport mechanism was not clearly understood Therefore a part of this thesis was dedicated to further investigating the transport properties of Mo based MXenes This includes Mo₂CTz out of plane ordered Mo₂TiC₂Tz and Mo₂Ti₂C₃Tz and vacancy ordered Mo₁ 33CTz Magneto transport of free standing thin films of the Mo based MXenes were studied showing that all Mo based MXenes have two transport regimes a VRH mechanism at lower temperatures and a thermally activated process at higher temperatures All Mo based MXenes except Mo₁ 33CTz show that the electrical transport is dominated by inter flake transfer As for Mo₁ 33CTz the primary electrical transport mechanism is more likely to be intra flake The synthesis of vacancy ordered MXenes Mo₁ 33CTz and W₁ 33CTz raised the question of possible introduction of vacancies in all MXenes Vacancy ordered MXenes are produced by selective etching of Al and Sc or Y atoms from the parent 3D MAX phases such as Mo₂ 3Sc₁ 3 2AlC with in plane chemical ordering of Mo and Sc However not all quaternary parent MAX phases form the in plane chemical ordering of the two M metals thus the synthesis of the vacancy ordered MXenes is restricted to a very limited number of MAX phases I present a new method to obtain MXene flakes with disordered vacancies that may be generalized to all quaternary MAX phases As proof of concept I chose Nb C MXene as this 2D material has shown promise in several applications including energy storage photothermal cell ablation and photocatalysts for hydrogen evolution Starting from synthesizing Nb₂ 3Sc₁ 3 2AlC quaternary solid solution and etching both the Sc and Al atoms resulted in Nb₁ 33C material with a large number of vacancies and vacancy clusters This method may be applicable to other quaternary or higher MAX phases wherein one of the transition metals is more reactive than the other and it could be of vital importance in applications such as catalysis and energy storage
