Hiram the Young Farmer By Burbank L. Todd      Hiram the Young Farmer Burbank L. Todd, 2009-03

Well after all the country isn't such a bad place as some city folk think. The young fellow who said this stood upon the highest point of the Ridge Road where the land sloped abruptly to the valley in which lay the small municipality of Crawberry on the one hand while on the other open fields and patches of woodland in a huge green and brown checkerboard pattern fell more easily to the bank of the distant river. Dotted here and there about the farming country lying before the youth as he looked westward were cottages or the more important looking homesteads on the larger farms and in the distance a white church spire behind the trees marked the tiny settlement of Blaine's Smithy.

Hiram the Young Farmer Burbank L. Todd, 2009-02-01      Hiram in the Middle West: A Young Farmer's Upward Struggle and Hiram the Young Farmer Burbank L. Todd, For an hour before the accommodation train stopped at Pringleton the rain had etched zigzag lines upon the windowpane beside Hiram Strong's seat so to find the platform aglitter with puddles in the dull lamp light and the water dripping drearily from the station eaves did not surprise him. What was rather astonishing was to find Pringleton such a very lonely place. As far as he could see when he had walked around the bungalow built station the light in the stationmaster's ticket office was the only light visible save the switch targets and the disappearing green lamps on the end of the train. Hiram with his heavy bag was the only passenger who had got off the evening train. When he came around to the front of the station again he saw the stationmaster humped over his desk in the bay window with a pen stuck over his ear looking for all the world like a secretary bird. He peered out of the window at Hiram curiously and finally pushed up the sash. "I don't know whether you know it or not, young fellow," the stationmaster said, "but the company charges mileage if you use this platform for a walking track. And you'll make trouble for me if you keep going around for I never have found out how many laps make a mile and I shan't know what to charge you." Hiram Strong smiled his approval of this brand of humor yet his question put in reply was quite serious. "Have you seen anybody around here, sir, from a place called Sunnyside Farm? There isn't anybody at Sunnyside Farm as far as I know," said the stationmaster, "and there hasn't been since the house burned down last year." "Yes, I know," Hiram said quickly. "But I rather expected Mr. Bronson would have somebody over here to meet me." Mr. Stephen Bronson asked the man, "Him that's just bought the Sunnyside place?" "Yes, it's quite a walk to the farm, isn't it? It is the longest two miles you ever walked," said the stationmaster. "Were you thinking to walk it to night?" "As there is nobody here to meet me, I guess I'll have to," replied the youth cheerfully. "Which way do I head?" "You'll have to start me right or else I may wear out your platform walking around and around on it all night." The stationmaster chuckled. "Well, young fellow," he observed, "it is evidently to my advantage to put you on your way. Turn around, pick up your bag, go right down those steps to the road and walk straight ahead. You are now facing west. When you get into the road you will find it not so dark as it seems. Dark enough, I guess muttered Hiram You can t miss the road even on a dark night for there is no fork in it till after you pass Sunnyside But asked the youth is there anybody up that way who will lodge me for the night as the Sunnyside house is burned You may get taken in at Miss Delia Pringle s just beyond Sunnyside first house after you pass the ruins of the burned farmhouse This station is named after her folks Don t make the mistake of going to the first house this side of Sunnyside He said this last so curiously that Hiram asked him Why not Because that is Yancey Battick s place He ll likely blow a charge of rock salt into you from his shotgun and then ask what you want afterward Why what s his idea asked Hiram much amazed Says he s afraid of rats that s all declared the stationmaster and immediately slammed down the window to shut out the searching February wind The youth hesitated for only a moment longer He rather thought the stationmaster of Pringleton was quite as odd as the man he called Yancey Battick who met all visitors with a salt loaded shotgun and was afraid of rats And this isn t really a night fit for a rat to be out Hiram muttered after he had walked for some time along the muddy road leading west from the station Occasionally while he was still near the railroad he passed a dwelling but it was just about supper time and nearly all the lights were at the backs of the houses Hardly a ray of cheerful lamp light reached the road The houses were situated farther apart as he continued his march The fine rain was penetrating in the extreme Hiram desired shelter more than he ever had before it seemed to him And just when it appeared as though nothing about his situation could be worse the heavens opened It had been doing this off and on all day But this water fall seemed heavier than any of those that had preceded it Hiram Strong saw a light ahead and a little to one side of the road It was not a very bright light perhaps it was drowned by the curtain of falling rain but it must be in a house he thought At a time like this it was any port in a storm He set out at a heavy run toward the light He found a sagging gate in a decrepit fence Plunging up a muddy path he reached a tiny porch which might have offered some shelter had not the roof leaked like a sieve Hard luck muttered the youth If they won t let me in His feet pounding on the rickety steps and the thump of his heavy bag on the porch aroused somebody within Hiram heard a firm step at the other side of the door Suddenly the door opened with an abruptness which was startling The door opened on a chain and through the aperture of about eight inches was thrust the brown muzzle of a double barreled shotgun that at the moment looked as big as a cannon to the youth He stepped back promptly and a cascade off the roof of the porch went down the back of his neck
