Pinks

Pink or pinkie is a word used to describe certain types of boats from as long ago as the 17th and 18th centuries.

The word pink described a square-rigged ship with a narrow overhanging stern, often used for carrying masts. It also described small ships with square masts. A pinkie is one of the oldest types of New England fishing and trading vessels with a mast, which is similar to the bows, carried well out beyond the molder like a constant mast, and North Sea Danish pink, of the early 19th century from which the name originates. Square-rigged boats without a foremast sail or the foremast boats were used for many purposes.

One of the main centers where they were used was in the parish of Chatham (now in Kent, Massachusetts) and in the town of Boston. The Revolution where they were used for the nearby banks. After the Revolution larger pinks turned to privateering. Some were very big at around 100 tons, but many of the smaller ones of less than 100 tons were built. The pink plans of these craft varied considerably depending on the job for which they were used.

The model illustrated is a fishing boat - the pinkie Light of 1820. The plans are taken from the splendid book by Charles G. Davis American Sailing Ships. This Plan of Mowry. See Fig. 4.17.

The American coastal trader

This type of craft can give you a lot of pleasure to make as a model. Schooner-rigged with two and sometimes three masts, these craft had various local names depending on the different regions they carried. For instance, harkness were lumber carriers, shore duffers carried various goods and other pinks. There were pinkies and bay carriers.
