J. Perry,2001 inadequate funding for maintenance of irrigation works and emerging shortages of water are prevalent The use of water charges to generate resources for maintenance and to reduce demand is widely advocated Examples from other utilities and from the domestic industrial sectors of water supply suggest the approach could be effective In developing countries the facilities required for measured and controlled delivery of irrigation are rarely in place and would require a massive investment in physical legal and administrative infrastructure To be effective in curtailing demand the marginal price of water must be significant The price levels required to cover operation and maintenance O M costs are too low to have a substantial impact on demand much less to actually bring supply and demand into balance On the other hand the prices required to control demand are unlikely to be within the politically feasible range Furthermore water supplied is a proper measure of service in domestic and industrial uses But in irrigation and especially as the water resource itself becomes constrained water consumption is the appropriate unit for water accounting This is exceptionally difficult to measure An alternative approach to cope with shortage would focus on assigning volumes to specific uses effectively rationing water where demand exceeds supply This approach has a number of potential benefits including simplicity transparency and the potential to tailor allocations specifically to hydrological situations particularly where salinity is a problem Data from Iran are presented to support these contentions      Inside Route Pilot U.S. Coast and Geodetic Survey,1913      Four Tales of Terror Robert E.
