French aeronautics shone brightly in the first decade of the twentieth Century but declined after the Great War To remedy this situation a new Ministry of Air launched in 1929 a large national program of scientific research in fluid mechanics including the creation of four institutes and five teaching centers in the faculties of sciences in Paris and the provinces This visionary policy supported by considerable means started a quite creative period and led to important achievements notably in the fields of atmospheric turbulence thermoconvection and wake vortices The usual picture of a period exclusively dominated by German and British contributions and growing North American ones comes out significantly revised The fruits of this policy will allow France to play a major role in the creation after World War II of the International Union of Theoretical and Applied Mechanics and are still visible today in the French teaching and research organization Based on original materials unearthed from a variety of archival sources and scientific papers the present book recounts this history in all its intertwined scientific industrial political and cultural dimensions Peer review recommendation The text is tremendously well written and it remains clear and accessible even in its most scientifically advanced dimensions The author is thus able to address both connoisseurs of the field who will enjoy reading and discovering not only scientific but also literary elements and references and neophytes who are never left by the wayside as the chapters progress An exceptional and original iconography usefully completes this picture without overloading it
