

near the turned pole or tree in the center of the Ghost Dance circle.

The Sioux and eagle feathers on their shirts and dresses more than feathers from any other bird. The eagle, bald or golden, is a powerful symbol, and during a recent Ghost Dance on Rosebud Reservation (late 1973), participants felt especially blessed when several eagles passed overhead.

Among the Cheyenne and Arapaho moccasins, with their black-and-white tails, and black, blue-tailed cranes were depicted as messengers from the spirit world.

Sometimes, mosquitoes, rainbows, and other air-borne signs also appear on Ghost Dance garments. Like the birds, they symbolized the belief that Ghost Dancers would be blown out of danger when the earth was renewed.

The records of Black Elk's day-long shirt-making, Nezamehewehat's calling in her dreams to make "a great number of sacred garments," and the Sioux's use of the special Ghost Dance talismans, Holy Medicine Maps, of Wing Bull's Hunkpapa band, all suggest that multiple production of Ghost Dance garments was common.¹

A number of Ghost Dance shirts turned into the Saint Francis Museum in 1903 (now in the Buffalo Memorial Lakota Museum in South Dakota) display a certain uniformity of style. Besides the shiny-and-no hair-and hair collected at Wounded Knee show stylistic commonalities, although shirts said to have been collected at Wounded Knee have continued and no numbers appear in those of the city, or, criss. The actual Wounded Knee shirts, which were worn by the majority band and his band, usually have no numbers. Two other turned brown around the top.

Many replicas of authentic Ghost Dance garments exist. Generally, except as the long hair-and hair, models attached to the long, bald and large white painted legs, lacking the sincerity and sincerity of the garments with authentic patterns, were on the outside with large stripes, all of the same color with colored fur and hair. These shirts may have been produced as late as 1900, when a reconstruction of the late Wounded Knee was staged for pilgrims in Cheyenne, Nebraska. Most noted in a reconstruction were collected in a museum and acquired a certain amount of use.

For those garments made long-haired of the religious influence the poem was strong, the beauty is evident, and the garment as a symbol of a major American religious movement is prominent.

For many scholars the poem and form of the Ghost Dance songs are nearly lost. It has been a temptation to include more songs, but as James Mooney, to whom is indebted for his insight in recording the Ghost songs, early stated, "no matter every dance" a new song might be made.
