Y. Baafi, N.A. Schofield, 2012-11-06 In diamond alluvial deposits the information about the spatial distribution of stone size is of crucial importance for the quantitative characterisation of the different areas of the deposit In fact the value of the diamond reserves depends strongly on the distribution of stone sizes between two areas with the same grade the most valuable is the one with larger stones The geological genesis of the mineralization related with the transport and deposition of stones in trapsites can create separated spatial areas corresponding to different stone size To characterise these distinct areas the non smooth transitions between them should be accounted for in the estimation of internal properties An extended version of zonal control of geostatistical estimation Soares et al 1995 proposed in this paper aims to characterising the classes of size histogram for each geological unit avoiding the smooth effect For this purpose the morphology of each geological unit is obtained by using two distinct criteria i first the points of each unit are classified according to the local and global probabilities of belonging to each unit Soares 1992 ii in a second classification the optimization technique of Simulated Annealing is used to rearrange the pre classified points in order to impose in the final morphological maps the spatial variability of experimental samples Goovaerts 1994 A case study of a diamond alluvial deposit with two geological units with distinct stone size histograms is presented The AusIMM Bulletin, 1997
