Principal Leadership in Taiwan Schools Roger C. Shouse, Kuan-Pei Lin, 2010-10-16 During the past two decades Taiwan s Ministry of Education has responded to globalization by restructuring school curricular instructional and decision making practices along western lines in an attempt to attain legitimacy on the world stage As a result Taiwanese principals once kings within their schools now must share power with other school stakeholders In the process these principals are held responsible for implementing reform measures that tend to damage trust and confidence in the system among local stakeholders because they cut against longstanding social and organizational norms

Principal Leadership in Taiwan Schools examines principals adjustment to their new leadership role highlighting the pervasive tensions between collegial forms of leadership with more authoritative top down models common to East Asian countries Such dilemmas are becoming increasingly common not only in Taiwan but in other nations including the U S Shouse and Lin examine them based on a review of Taiwan s past and recent history of school reform principal interviews and school observations The authors knowledge and experience as researchers and teachers in Taiwan s educational system allow them to provide insightful perspectives on how to balance this precarious shift of power
