

Imperialism and World War I

The British Dominions Round the Throne
 An illustration from the British Empire Exhibition, 1905, showing the British Empire's global reach.

GLOBAL BRITISH EMPIRE dominated the nineteenth-century European imperial movement. The British Empire was the largest in history, covering more than a quarter of the world's land area. It was a vast empire, stretching from the British Isles to the far corners of the globe. The British Empire was a source of pride and power for the British people. It was a source of wealth and influence. It was a source of glory and honor. The British Empire was a source of everything that was good and great in the world. The British Empire was the greatest empire the world has ever known. Similar illustrations could be found in the newspapers of France, Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, and Russia.

Imperialism, and military weapons provided the chief sources of European power. They made it possible for a relatively few European and American to impose their will, by force or the threat of force, on other peoples many times their number. Imperialism as well as material advantage allowed Westerners to have their way. The growth of national states that contained the loyalty, service and submission of their inhabitants to a degree previously unknown was a Western phenomenon. It permitted Western nations to deploy their resources more effectively than ever before.

Westerners also possessed another, less tangible weapon. They considered their civilization and way of life to be superior to all others. This often implicit arrogant self-confidence fostered their expansive mind.

The first half of the century was generally the century of colonial expansion. The loss of the American colonies had sobered even the British. The French acquired and part of Indochina, and the British added to their holdings in Canada, India, Australia, and New Zealand. The dominant doctrine of free trade opposed political interference in other lands, a policy unrepentable.

Britain ruled the waves and had great advantages as a result of being the first country to experience the industrial revolution (see Chapter 1). The British were usually content to trade as was without reservations. Yet they were not free to trade with a less industrialized country with their trade. Still, at midcentury, if not before, most people opposed further participation overseas.

1 Expansion of Western Power

The "new imperialism" of the Western powers was a response to the world's for colonies.

composite subjectivity in various forms may be much more common than we think Combining Minds is also the first book length defence of constitutive panpsychism against all aspects of the combination problem Constitutive panpsychism is an increasingly prominent theory holding that consciousness is naturally inherent in matter with human consciousness built up out of this basic consciousness the same way human bodies are built up out of physical matter Such a view requires that many very simple conscious minds can compose a single very complex one and a major objection made against constitutive panpsychism is that they cannot that minds simply do not combine This is the combination problem which Roelofs scrutinizes dissects and refutes It reflects not only contemporary debates but a long philosophical tradition of contrasting the apparently indivisible unity of the mind with the deep and pervasive divisibility of the material world Combining Minds draws together the threads of this problem and develops a powerful and flexible response to it
