Timber, Tannery and Tourists Lester St. John Thomas,2020-06-30 Originally published in 1979 This is an unusual history of a small town in the once heavily forested hills and valleys of the upper Hudson River The story starts in pre glacial times follows through when white men discovered the great timber lands and when the place was an outlying area of Queensbury called Westfield It continues through its birth as a town called Fairfield then Luzerne and later Lake Luzerne It tells of a great tannery and other industries and its surge of popularity as a summer resort It mentions names from the first loggers to the first town council and down to the present day 1979 Exploited for its timber by British loyalists settled by soldiers of Scotch Irish Welsh and English ancestry infused with French from Canada and seaports near Manhattan and strengthened with occasional Germanic and Italian immigrants the new town became a small melting pot of home seeking folk from the old country This typical American mix is reflected in the birth and growth of the town     The Adirondack Architecture Guide, Southern-Central Region Janet A.
