Hairy Cell Leukemia:

Hairy-Cell Leukaemia J. C. Cawley, G. F. Burns, F. G. J. Hayhoe, 2012-12-06 Hairy cell leukaemia HCL is an established clinicopathological entity typified by a chronic picture of substantial splenomegaly less frequent hepatomegaly and only inconspicuous lymphadenopathy Central to the diagnosis is the pathognomonic hairy cell HC a distinctive mononuclear cell that circulates in varying numbers and infiltrates a variety of organs including the bone marrow and spleen Peripheral pancytopenia is often present and circulating HCs may be infrequent HCs are invariably present in the bone marrow but perhaps because of the extensive fibrosis characteristic of the disease the marrow is frequently difficult to aspirate and confirmation of the diagnosis may require histopathological examination of biopsy material The incidence of the disease has been given as 2% of leukaemias 29 319 or as approximately 1 % of identifiable lymphomas 230 Our own experience of collecting cases in the United Kingdom leads us to expect that at any given time one patient with HCL will be attending a clinic serving some 150 000 people

Hairy Cell Leukemia, 1977 In three patients with hairy cell leukemia HCL the similarity of the surface ultrastructure of cells from multiple sites was studied These sites included peripheral blood and spleen in one patient and peripheral blood and bone marrow in two patients The hairy cells from the peripheral blood of these patients were also compared with those of two other patients with

HCL The cells in all five cases had a surface comprised of exaggerated broad based ruffles with an occasional area of short microvilli Although the shape of the ruffles and the number of microvilli varied slightly there was a marked similarity for all organ sites sampled and for suspensions or pieces of tissue prepared for viewing The malignant cells in hairy cell leukemia whether they are harvested from the peripheral blood the bone marrow or the spleen and whether they are viewed in a suspension or in whole tissue have a unique cell surface ultrastructure which is easily confirmed by scanning electron microscopy

Hairy-cell Leukaemia John Burthem, John C. Cawley, 2011-10-21 Hairy cell Leukaemia HCL has always attracted an interest out of all proportion to its frequency and continues to do so There are two reasons for this The first is that the disease is unusually responsive to therapy and second is that it has provided a number of important insights into B cell biology This monograph is a comprehensive account of hairy cell leukaemia and aims to provide a more detailed account than is available in the existing literature The work is timely because a consensus has now emerged concerning accurate differential diagnosis and curative treatment These aspects therefore form the focus of the book and are considered in detail The basic advances in the laboratory that encourage the belief that elucidation of the underlying oncogenic event in the disease may be within reach The background to this belief is extensively renewed As a result the monograph will be of interest and practical value to both clinicians and researchers in this and related fields
