Borchert, 2017-05-31 Most studies of Buddhist communities tend to be limited to villages individual temple communities or a single national community Buddhist monastics however cross a number of these different framings They are part of local communities are governed through national legal frameworks and participate in both national and transnational Buddhist networks Educating Monks makes visible the ways Buddhist communities are shaped by all of the above collectively and often simultaneously Educating Monks examines a minority Buddhist community in Sipsongpann a region located on China's southwest border with Myanmar and Laos Its people the Dai lue are double minorities They are recognized by the Chinese state as part of a minority group and they practice Theravada Buddhism a minority form within China where Mahayana Buddhism is the norm Theravada has long been the primary training ground for Dai lue men and since the return of Buddhism to the area in the years following Mao Zedong's death the Dai lue have put many of their resources into providing monastic education for their sons However the author's analysis of institutional organization within Sipsongpann the governance of religion there and the movements of monks revealing the ethnoscape that the monks of Sipsongpann participate in points to educational contexts that depend not just on local villagers but also resources from the local Communist government and aid from Chinese Mahayana monks and Theravada monks from Thailand and Myanmar While the Dai lue monks draw on these various resources for the development of the sangha they do not share the same agenda and must continually engage in a careful political dance between villagers who want to revive traditional forms of Buddhism a Chinese state that is at best indifferent to the continuation of Buddhism and transnational monks that want to import their own modern forms of Buddhism into the region Based on ethnographic fieldwork and interviews with Dai lue monks in China Thailand and Singapore this ambitious and sophisticated study will find a ready audience among students and scholars of the anthropology of Buddhism and religion education and transnationalism in Southeast and East Asia
