

Waterfowl Migration

Following an instinct many thousands of years old, millions of ducks and geese fly south every autumn. They spend the winter in the southern United States, Mexico, and Central and South America. As spring arrives, the birds return to the lakes and marshes of North America, driven by a biological urge to nest.

The Mystery of Migration

How do birds find their way as they migrate over thousands of miles? Scientists believe they navigate using the sun and stars, visual landmarks, the Earth's magnetic field, and gravity. Waterfowl follow general routes, or highways in the sky, called flyways.

Welcoming Waterfowl

Stopovers are critical during these arduous journeys. Wildlife refuges, parks, and natural areas not only offer seasonal homes but also provide places for migrating birds to stop, feed, and rest up for the long trip ahead.
