German Flying Aces Arthur Williams, When the Great War erupted across Europe in 1914 military aviation was still in its infancy The first powered flight had occurred barely eleven years earlier and most military leaders viewed aircraft as curiosities better suited for reconnaissance than combat Yet within months of the conflict s outbreak the skies above the Western Front would become a deadly arena where young men battled for supremacy in fragile machines of wood wire and canvas Germany entered the war with a modest aviation force possessing fewer than 250 military aircraft scattered across various units The German Air Service or Deutsche Luftstreitkr fte initially focused on observation and artillery spotting with pilots and observers working to direct ground fire and gather intelligence on enemy positions These early aviators flew unarmed their greatest weapon being a camera and their most pressing concern avoiding enemy ground fire The transformation from reconnaissance to combat occurred gradually born from the practical needs of warfare As opposing observation aircraft began interfering with each other s missions pilots started carrying rifles pistols and even hand grenades to discourage enemy flyers The first aerial victories were often crude affairs with pilots taking potshots at each other while struggling to control their aircraft The inherent difficulties of aiming a rifle while piloting a primitive aircraft made these early encounters more dangerous to the shooter than the target
