Case #6 in Lakeside Company

During the audit, assistants should be properly supervised to avoid errors and inaccuracies in the report. The auditor should check the information and analysis provided by the assistant to ensure that the data in the report is consistent with reality. In addition, the supervision of the assistant is necessary to ensure that the conclusions presented in the document are consistent with the audit objectives. In Exhibit 6-1, supervision helped identify discrepancies in product prices. In addition, supervision may require additional validation of the data presented in the report (Kleijn & Van Leeuwen, 2018). It was revealed in Exhibit 6-1 that not all requisitions were approved properly.

An audit document must include elements such as objectives, conclusions, and scope of testing. Before conducting an audit, it is necessary to determine what this procedure is for and what information the report should demonstrate. Scope determines the depth of the audit, including objects for analysis and period. Objectives and scope help define the scope and limitations of the procedure. Understanding the purpose of the audit and the scope of the analysis helps save time on its implementation. Moreover, a report with clearly defined goals and scope is more likely to meet the requirements of the company's management and help identify violations or frauds, if any, in the analyzed area. The Conclusion at the end of the report is necessary to determine whether the audit performed satisfies the objectives. Identifying problems and developing a plan to solve them is also needed.

The choice of audit procedure should be approached to the client's needs. There are standardized audit procedures that companies can use in cases where general data analysis is needed. On the other hand, if a client asks for an audit of specific data specific to his company, designing client-specific procedures is necessary. In this type of audit procedure, the general standards for conducting an audit are preserved, but the goals and scope of the information analyzed are developed specifically for each case. In addition, the auditor's tasks may also differ in the context of client-specific procedures.
