Introduction

In Australia malignant melanoma ranks forth among cancers as a cause of morbidity and premature death (Armstrong 1985). For this reason, and because the State of Western Australia has one of the highest incidence rates of melanoma in the world (Holman et al. 1980), we undertook a multidisciplinary research program embracing the epidemiology, histopathology, and clinical management of melanoma. A major component of our research was a population-based case-control study in which constitutional traits, sunlight exposure, hormones, diet and other possible causal factors were evaluated. We have already published several reports of the results relating to particular subject areas (Holman and Armstrong 1983, 1984a, b; Holman et al. 1984b, 1985; English et al. 1985). In this report we aim to bring together in summary form the key results of the project to date and to present new data on diet and other factors.

Methods

Detailed accounts of the materials and methods can be found in the publications cited above. What follows is a brief summary of the study design and methods of analysis.

The case series comprised 511 patients with histologically proven preinvasive or invasive melanoma of the skin. They represented 76% of a total of 670 newly incident eligible cases less than 80 years of age and resident in accessible regions of Western Australia during a period of 675 days beginning 1 January 1980. Thirteen percent of eligible cases were excluded from interview for medical reasons, and further 11% were either untraceable or uncooperative. A panel of six pathologists classified sections from the tumours of all but 14 of the 511 patients, according to whether the histological type of melanoma was Hutch-
