Cole,2007 In this exploratory study the semantic relationships between geometry word problems and think aloud protocols collected after reading and during problem solving are examined These relationships are examined using Latent Semantic Analysis a computational technique that quantifies semantic relationships between text selections This mixed methods study addressed four questions a Do students with and without learning disabilities differ on the extent that verbal protocols overlap with causal and focal sentences b Is there a correlation between human judgment and LSA analysis of think aloud protocols c To what extent do LSA cosines reading comprehension measures and ORF measures predict problem solving ability and d To what extent are problem solving protocols semantically related to the problem text for students with and without learning disabilities A limited population sample and data collection schedule did not permit analysis between ability levels A visual inspection of the data indicated that students without disabilities did not tend to focus more on the critical information when reading the word problem but did focus on critical information when solving the problem A correlation matrix indicated no significant correlations between LSA and hand coding LSA cosines and ORF measures were not predictors of problem solving ability however SVT was a significant predictor Numerous limitations including the number of participants scheduling issues and inter rater agreement potentially impacted the results of this study Geometry Holt Rinehart & Winston,2005-06-01
