"Trust out of Bounds: Signals of Reliability in Networked News-gathering"

Until recently, people received news mostly from established publications or via word of mouth from people they knew. While not always trusted, these sources were familiar and their reputation for reliability known. The advent of online communication has brought new sources for news: social media such as blogs, Twitter updates, online discussions and comments, etc. Here, the source is often unknown and the potential for deception is high. In this talk I will introduce signaling theory as a framework for analyzing these issues, distinguishing among the varied uses people have for news, including entertainment, establishing their own status in an information-based society, and making life and death decisions. And, I will show how design can make it easier for people to assess the veracity of news gathered from social media.
