

A Guide for Selecting and Planting Golf Course Trees

A basic knowledge of trees, golf course architecture, and a defined planting objective are critical to select new trees on the golf course.

BY JIM SKORULSKI

For many, trees are synonymous with American golf. That point may be arguable in some locations, but trees continue to be a major component of most American golf course landscapes. Good quality tree species that are planted in the proper locations can be spectacular and functional golf course features for decades. On the other hand, poor quality or ill-advised tree plantings can be a nightmare for the golf course and those who manage it. It is always disappointing to see new tree plantings that are destined to fail because too little thought was given to species selection and placement. It remains a mystery how such a casual attitude can be taken towards planting and maintaining trees, considering the long-range implications and expenses associated with those actions. It takes specialized knowledge of trees, golf course architecture, and sun angles to properly locate and arrange tree plantings. It can be a challenging task, even for experienced professionals.

GETTING STARTED

Most golf courses are not faced with major tree planting projects. In fact, USGA agronomists spend far more time convincing golfers to remove trees that have a negative impact on the golf course. Trees should only be added to a golf course when there is a purpose for doing so. Planting trees just for the sake of it is a terrible idea that will cause years of added expense, frustration, and aggravation. New trees are required from time to time to replace aging, hazardous, or unsightly trees. New tree species also may be added to increase tree species diversity and add interest to the golf course. The purpose or function of any new tree added to the golf course should be defined before any other steps are taken.

It is difficult to determine tree planting needs without first knowing what you already have. A thorough inventory of all the primary trees on the golf course is a good starting point. It will

The oak and maple trees pictured along the right side of the fairway are beginning to block sight lines to the right side of the green complex. Too little thought was given to the planting's future impacts on the original design intent and play of the hole.
