Liberalization of Russian Foreign Trade Oleg Dmitrievich Davydov, Valeriĭ Alekseevich Oreshkin, 2000 It is almost two years since the publication of Oleg Davydov's significant study Inside Out The Radical Transformation of Russian Foreign Trade 1992 1997 and a lot has changed since then including the August 1998 financial and banking crisis in Russia Nevertheless the views Davydov expressed in that book are still relevant and many of the recommendations he made have been implemented to good effect This book Liberalization of Russian Foreign Trade takes up where the first left off Here Davydov teams up with Valeriy A Oreshkin and they systematize and explain the issues related to the formation of Russia's foreign trade policy The transition from centrally planned economy to market economy has been difficult The largest problem of course has been integrating Russia into the world economic community and learning how to do business with foreign counterparts and competitors Another problem of potentially overwhelming proportions is the issue of Russia's foreign debts and the authors investigate how the country might modernize its infrastructure and invest in its future despite the enormous foreign debt repayments Part of the solution the authors believe will come from foreign investments yet Russian businesspeople must continue to convince foreign investors that investing in Russia is a good risk However given the rise of criminal activities in the foreign trade arena foreign investors are understandably hesitant In the foreseeable future the creation of internal and external conditions for a more complete integration of Russia into the world economy will remain a top priority But the key milestones to that greater goal are already in flux In an objective and informed way this book provides the best explanation available of how those milestones have changed and how such changes may affect the future development of a competitive Russian economy Russia's Resource Dependency Inna Sayfer, 2007 American Book Publishing Record, 2000 Economic Bulletin, 1995 Russian Trade Policy Sergei Sutyryn, Olga Y.
