BY ROSE LU

Claire was the first up. The adults were still tired from the night before. They'd had dinner at a fancy restaurant, where the chairs had been covered in a cream fabric, backed with decorative bows. When the guests were seated, it looked as though they were wearing big, poofy wedding dresses.

The celebration wasn't a wedding – it was a birthday. Wai Po's seventieth. She'd wanted all her family to be there, and so Claire and her mum had made the long flight to China. Claire loved staying in her grandmother's apartment. Every surface was covered in photos: eldest aunty in a dance costume, smiling proudly; middle aunty hunched over her watercolours; Claire's mum receiving some kind of prize; all three sisters in front of the tiger cage at the zoo. Claire thought it must be fun to have siblings. For starters, you wouldn't have to play board games with your parents.

She stood on the couch to take a closer look at the photo of her mum, and there, down between the back of the couch and the wall, she noticed the edge of another photo frame. It must have slipped. Claire got on the floor, lay on her stomach, and fished around till her hand reached it.

It wasn't a photo but a tiger, cut from a single sheet of red paper. Claire had never seen anything like it. She couldn't imagine scissors sharp enough to cut the almonds of the tiger's eyes or the stripes on its tail. Carefully, she opened the frame to take a closer look. The tiger was even more impressive up close. The paper was so thin her breath caused the creature to ripple and dance. She wondered where it came from and why it was behind the couch.

There was a rap on the front door. A cracking yawn came from the spare bedroom, followed by slow footsteps. Eldest aunty had jet lag after her long flight from Canada. Still in her pyjamas, she opened the door. It was a cousin – Claire couldn't remember which one – and he held a bag of steamed buns.

All that day, she wanted to ask about the tiger, but the stream of visitors never stopped. It was exhausting, and everyone had a different title – Claire couldn't just say "uncle" or "cousin" like she did in English. Her mum had to whisper the right names in her ear. It felt as though the day would never end, but at least their guests brought snacks: milky white rabbit lollies, perfectly round longans, peanuts boiled in their shells.
