Lang, 2012-12-06 Metals and alloys rely for their application at high temperature on the formation and retention of oxide scales which act as a barrier between the metallic substrate and the reactive species in the environment such as O S N C Cl etc This protection concept requires that the oxide grows slowly develops a dense uniform layer is well adherent has sufficient ductility to accommodate plastic deformation of the substrate and is resistant to thermal cycling For many years it has been known that small concentrations of certain active elements such as Y and the rare earths as well as carbon and sulphur can exercise a significant influence upon the oxidation corrosion behaviour of high temperature metals and alloys An increasing number of experimental studies on this topic have been published recently However no generally accepted understanding with regard to the detailed mechanisms and the way in which alloy composition and structure temperature and environmental conditions etc are interacting has yet been achieved although many often controversial theories and ideas have been presented It therefore seemed to be an appropriate time to bring together a group of experts to review and evaluate the current state of the art and to discuss various aspects of this important topic
