Ground Motions from High-explosive Experiments Leo F. Ingram, 1972 A review of ground shock data from recent large near surface high explosive tests is made Emphasis is on close in motions in rock Wave forms are shown for selected shots and locations Comparisons are made among wave forms for similar test conditions in different geologic materials including soil shale granite and sandstone Variations in peak motion amplitudes at various depths and ranges are discussed for the different geologic materials Author

Decoupling of Ground Shock from Explosions in Rock Cavities James L. Drake, 1974 Decoupling explosive energy by detonating charges in cavities larger than the charge is an effective method for reducing ground shock magnitudes over those of fully contained bursts The report presents an analysis of ground motions generated by decoupled explosions in rock cavities A simplified elastic solution is used to calculate particle motion magnitudes and time histories produced by an explosion in rock as a function of the initial cavity radius and the loading density of the explosive Loading density is defined as the total explosive weight divided by the initial cavity volume Modified author abstract
