The Cost of Being Landlocked Jean-François Arvis, Gaël Raballand, Jean-François Marteau, 2007 A large proportion of the least developed countries are landlocked and their access to world markets depends on the availability of a trade corridor and transit systems Based on empirical evidence from World Bank projects and assessments in Africa Central Asia and elsewhere this paper proposes a microeconomic quantitative description of logistics costs The paper theoretically and empirically highlights that landlocked economies are primarily affected not only by a high cost of freight services but also by the high degree of unpredictability in transportation time The main sources of costs are not only physical constraints but widespread rent activities and severe flaws in the implementation of the transit systems which prevent the emergence of reliable logistics services The business and donor community should push toward implementation of comprehensive facilitation strategies primarily at the national level and the design of robust and resilient transport and transit regimes A better understanding of the political economy of transit and a review of the implementation successes and failures in this area are needed

Access to the Sea for Developing Land-Locked States Martin Glassner, 2012-12-06 This study is an outgrowth of an interest in the question of access to the sea developed by the author during a ten month sojourn during 1962 and 1963 as American Vice Consul in Antofagasta Chile During this period he had the opportunity to visit Peru three times and Bolivia twice This experience supplemented by research in many libraries in New York Washington and California and by interviews documents and other reference materials resulted in a detailed study of Bolivia s campaign for an outlet to the sea 1 The present study has drawn some material from the earlier one but is such an elaborate expansion of it that it might well be considered a wholly new effort The effort was made because the problem of access to the sea has become more critical since the Second World War as the emphasis on trade and economic development has grown while at the same time many new land locked states were being born There have moreover been more threatened and actual interferences with free transit during this period than during the preceding half century and more A thorough examination of the subject seemed in order then as an aid to an understanding of the problems involved and as a guide to future attempts to resolve them In addition to a general survey of the question three case studies have been included both as illustrations of many of these problems and as specific situations by which to test proposed solutions
