

BOOK REVIEWS

Anna T. Cianciolo and Robert J. Sternberg, Intelligence: A Brief History. Blackwell Brief Histories of Psychology. Oxford, UK: Blackwell Publishing, 2004. 170 pp. $52.95 (cloth). ISBN 1-4051-0823-1. $17.95 (paper). ISBN 1-4051-0824-X.

From the outset, Intelligence: A Brief History presents its readers with a problem: what is this book really about? Judging from the title, the unwary reader would presume that Cianciolo and Sternberg have set out to provide a quick overview of the historical development of the concept of intelligence, the practices that have been invented to measure it, and the uses to which it has been put. Indeed, this is precisely what they claim to have accomplished at the beginning of their conclusion (p. 135). However, as a contribution to history, the book is an abject failure. Events and developments that occurred before the 1960s or even 1970s are scarcely mentioned, and when they are, the exact details are often inaccurate. The authors provide no attention to historical context, to the specific intellectual traditions associated with the various articulations of the notion of intelligence they describe, or to the effects of the sociological/cultural locations of these developments in shaping the concepts and practices adopted. Indeed, a quick check of the bibliography reveals that of the approximately 291 works cited, only about 35 (12 percent) were published before 1960. Moreover, although there is an extensive literature on the history of intelligence and its tests, as the readers of this journal well know, only five (1.7 percent) of the works listed were historical treatments of the issues addressed by the book. Indeed, such central figures in the historiography as Hamilton Cravens, Kurt Danziger, Carl Degler, Raymond Fancher, Nikolas Rose, Franz Samelson, Michael Sokal, Gillian Sutherland, William Tucker, Adrian Woolldridge, and Leila Zenderland—and I could go on—are conspicuous by their absence.

So, if not history, then what is Intelligence: A Brief History really attempting to do? At its best, it provides a survey of some of the developments and issues raised around the psychological study of intelligence in the last two to three decades of the twentieth century. The authors argue that there have been, and still are, seven distinct metaphors that have guided investigations of intelligence: geographic, computational, biological, epistemological, sociological, anthropological, and systems. In chapters devoted to the nature, measurement, and teaching of intelligence, as well as to the relative weights of genes and environment in accounting for intelligence and to group differences in intelligence, they chart how these metaphors shape thinking and practice in each of these domains. Not surprisingly, given Sternberg's own theoretical orientation, the systems vision of how to understand intelligence, which involves "viewing intelligence as a set of multiple independent parts, or even multiple intelligences" (p. 26) comes off best, as most consistent with the facts such as they are and most able to reflect the complexities of the individual dynamically blending genetic inheritance with biological development and sociocultural fashioning. Nonetheless, Cianciolo and Sternberg do an excellent job of providing balanced overviews of each of these metaphors, why they retain plausibility, and what they are contributing to current investigations of intelligence. For those seeking an easy-to-digest primer on the current state of the field suitable for undergraduates, Intelligence: A Brief History could work very well. Although some practitioners might dispute just how distinct the seven metaphors really are in practice, they do provide a useful heuristic for coming to grips with and thinking about contemporary intelligence research.
