

Ball Flight Laws

In our three dimensional world, there are only three possible flight characteristics of a golf shot: distance, height, and direction. Ball flight laws refer to the physical forces of nature which influence the flight of the ball. These factors will help you understand why a ball hooks or slices, why it goes high or low, why it travels a long way or not very far at all. Learning what makes the ball fly is the first step in not only learning to swing correctly, but in deciphering what your students are doing correctly or incorrectly.

CLUBHEAD SPEED

This will determine the distance your shot will travel with a given club, assuming you make solid contact.

EFFECTIVE LOFT AT IMPACT

This will determine the height the ball will fly. If, at impact, the hands are behind the clubhead, the loft will be increased and the ball will fly higher. If, at impact, the hands are ahead of the clubhead, the loft will be decreased and the ball will fly lower.

SWEET SPOT

This is the focal point of your club face (usually in the center) and, if struck there, you will get solid contact and maximum distance.

CLUBHEAD PATH (PATH OF HANDS)

This refers to the direction the clubhead is traveling when it meets the ball. The path will be either towards the target (5), to the right of the target (8), or to the left of the target (2). The initial direction of the ball will be a result of the direction of the club-head path at impact.

CLUBFACE ANGLE

This refers to the direction the face of the club is pointing at impact. The face of the club at impact will be either square (2, 5, 8), open (3, 6, 9) or closed (1, 4, 7). This accounts for the curve of the ball toward the end of its flight. Shots hit with short irons curve less than those hit with long irons or woods because the greater amount of back spin offsets the side spin.

The clubhead path, or the path of the hands in the impact area, provides the initial direction of the ball, and the clubface angle at impact provides the curve of the ball towards the end of its flight. The ball can start either towards the target, to the right of the target (push), or to the left of the target (pull). Off each path, the clubface angle at impact determines if the ball goes right (slice), left (hook), or continues straight. This gives us nine possible flight patterns, of which only one is straight.

It is important to note that ball flight laws apply only when proper alignment is observed.
