Focus and Scope of the Course

This course explores the relationship between the organization and performance of Canadian federalism by focusing on issues in public policies. Not many policy areas can be treated here, but students should gain an encapsulated understanding of two main tendencies in contemporary Canada: one is the tendency for governments to assert sole jurisdiction and extend their legislative reach over aspects of civil society usually reserved to citizens, voluntary associations and families; the other goes in the opposite direction as ordinary people are increasingly involved in public life as coproducers of public goods and services. We will describe and assess these opposing tendencies. It is hoped that the ideas explored may be as relevant to the future lawyer, politician, administrator, and citizen as to the future scholar.
