

Adult Age Differences in Memory Performance: Tests of an Associative Deficit Hypothesis

Moshe Naveh-Benjamin
Ben-Gurion University of the Negev

An associative hypothesis to explain and predict older adults' deficient explicit episodic memory performance was outlined and tested. The hypothesis attributes a substantial part of older adults' deficient memory performance to their difficulty in merging unrelated attributes—units of an episode into a cohesive unit. Although each of the components can be memorized to a reasonable degree, the associations that tie the attributes—units to each other grow weaker in old age. Four experiments are reported that provide (a) a converging validity to the hypothesis by demonstrating this associative deficit for both intrinsic relationships and extrinsic relationships and (b) a discriminant validity to the hypothesis by contrasting and testing competing predictions made by the associative hypothesis and by alternative hypotheses. The implications of these results to older adults' episodic memory performance are discussed.

The ability to learn new information and retrieve previously learned information is essential for successful aging. It allows older adults to adapt to changes in their environment, social roles, and self-concept. Memory researchers interested in life-span development have attempted to explain adult age differences in memory performance with the aim of both increasing our understanding of older adults' behavior and establishing a knowledge base that will constrain memory theories in general. Several hypotheses have been advanced to explain the relatively poor memory performance of older adults, including a deficit in semantic processing, a failure of metamemory, a failure of deliberate recollection, a reduction in processing resources (see Light, 1991, for a review), and a failure of inhibitory processes (Hasher & Zacks, 1988). Although all of the above are related to older adults' memory deficits, especially those deficits that characterize episodic memory, none of them provide an explanation for the full range of phenomena associated with older adults' episodic memory deficits.

Chalfonte and Johnson (1996) have suggested that part of older adults' deficient memory performance stems from their difficulty in binding the information into complex memories (see also Gilbert, 1941; Light, 1992; and MacKay & Burke, 1990). The present study extended this suggestion by testing an associative deficit hypothesis (ADH) that focused on the distinction between memory for single units and memory for association among units. This hypothesis claimed that an important component of older adults' poorer episodic memory is their deficiency in creating and retrieving links between single units of information. The basic units can be two items; an item and its context; two contextual elements; or, more generally, the representation of two mental codes. The extent to which a given memory task requires the creation or use of such associations is a significant determinant of older people's memory performance.

The purpose of this study was to determine the possible implications of this hypothesis on the memory performance of older adults and to experimentally demonstrate some of its critical predictions. This was done (a) by demonstrating an associative deficit in two experiments, each of which used different tasks that required processing both single units and their association to each other, and (b) by contrasting, in two further experiments, predictions based on an ADH with ones made by other current hypotheses.

Demonstration of the Utility of an ADH

Complex events consist of multiple kinds of information sources that are related together. An event can include the semantic content, information about the time in which the event occurred, the place in which it took place, the acting agents, their characteristics, and so on. All of these aspects integrated with the internal cognitive state of the person are encoded as an episode. Remembering such an episode requires that at least some of the components be retained, as well as their relationships with each other.

In the literature, different types of associations were, for the most part, treated separately (but see Chalfonte & Johnson, 1996; Johnson, 1992; and Johnson, Hashtroudi, & Lindsay, 1993, for a different view). For example, the relationships of two messages were treated within a paired-associates paradigm. The relationships of a message and a voice were treated as memory for context. Finally, memory for a message in a specific time and place was investigated as memory for source. All of these examples, how-
