Estranging the Novel Katarzyna Bartoszyńska, 2021-08-03 To develop a theory of world literature this book demands that the theory of the novel can no longer ignore literary forms other than realism Winner of the Donald Murphy Prize for a Distinguished First Book by the American Conference on Irish Studies and the Wacław Lednicki Award in the Humanities by the Polish Institute of Arts and Sciences of America For centuries the standard account of the development of the novel focused on the rise of realism in English literature Studies of early novels connected the form to various aspects of British life across the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries including the burgeoning middle class the growth of individualism and the emergence of democracy and the nation state But as the push for teaching and learning global literature grows this narrative is insufficient for studying novel forms outside of a predominately English speaking British and American realm In Estranging the Novel Katarzyna Bartoszyńska explores how the emergence and growth of world literature studies has challenged the centrality of British fiction to theories of the novel's rise She argues that a historicist approach frequently reinforces the realist paradigm that has cast other traditions as minor conceding a normative vision of the novel as it seeks to explain why historical forces produced different forms elsewhere Recasting the standard narrative by looking at different novelistic literary forms including the Gothic travel writing and queer fiction Bartoszyńska offers a compelling comparative study of Polish and Irish works published across the long nineteenth century that emphasize fictionality or the problem of world building in literature Reading works by Ignacy Krasicki Jan Potocki Narcyza Michowska and Witold Gombrowicz alongside others by Jonathan Swift Charles Maturin Oscar Wilde and Samuel Beckett Bartoszyńska shows that the history of the novel's rise demands a more capacious and rigorous approach to form as well as a reconceptualization of the relationship between fiction and its cultural contexts By modeling such a heterogeneous account of the novel form Estranging the Novel paves the way for a bracing and diverse understanding of the makeup of contemporary world literature and the many texts it encompasses and a new perspective on the British novel as well
