

6 Ways to Make Friends with your Feelings

"We destroy ourselves when we stop feeling. If you bury your feelings within you, you become a graveyard."

Bernie S Siegel

Accept without judgement	Name it to Tame it	Sit with the Feeling	Regulate yourself	Moving on	Choose where you will dwell
Allow yourself to FEEL what you are feeling. Whatever the feeling, it is okay. It may not be comfortable but there is no reason to beat yourself up. You are human, humans have feelings.	By acknowledging the feeling, and its helpful to name the actual feeling, and by declaring it to yourself or someone else you can often lessen its power.	Let yourself experience the feeling. Express it in a way that is not harmful for you or others and is appropriate to your situation – waiting until you are in a more appropriate place can be okay as long as you do find time to sit with the feeling rather than just repeatedly squash it down.	When feelings are overwhelming this is tough and it is very individual. What calms or regulates one person could add more anxiety or stress for another. The key here is practicing lots of regulating activities as part of your routines and gradually learning which ones work best for each type of feeling.	This is not ignoring the feeling this is a conscious decision to move on having accepted, named, sat with the feeling and calmed yourself. Moving on can take a variety of forms – often immersing ourselves in something else. We might move on from that feeling for some time or we might only manage for a few hours or even minutes before we need to repeat the process.	Thoughts can come and go but we make active choices about what we decide to focus upon – and that's where we will dwell. So, make conscious choices to focus on some of the good feelings, what can you be grateful for, what things make you happy what can you do to take care of yourself. There are lots of challenging situations that we just can't change BUT we can choose which aspects of our lives we will give most attention to, not saying it's easy BUT it is possible.
