

Helping Others to Feel Heard

Listen carefully when others are speaking. Try to give all of your attention to the speaker and not spend listening time thinking about what you'd like to say next.

Use active listening in conversations; leave pauses for the speaker to elaborate, paraphrase and repeat back what the speaker says to check your understanding.

Maintain eye contact that is comfortable for you and the speaker.

Use open body language when listening to others.

Give others options, especially in group staff meetings, for whether they want to engage in public speaking or contribute in other ways that are comfortable for them.

Share a smile with the speaker while you are listening.

And at regular intervals or make 'micro-breaks' to show you are listening.

Ask knowledge questions that may be trying to say we're listening there.

If you feel uncomfortable to do so, check in with others and encourage colleagues to speak to someone else instead if they have concerns or struggles.

Thank colleagues for their contributions and let them know that their thoughts and ideas are valued.
