Getting Off to a Good Start

by Polli Scholt

As the beginning of the school year approaches, parents of children who will be beginning school soon find themselves busy with preparations and details that are necessary to complete for this major event. There are forms to fill in, doctor's appointments to be made, and shopping to be done. While all these tasks are for the adults, there are some things to consider from the children's point of view in order for the transition from home, daycare, or babysitter to school to be a successful event.

One of the major issues that needs consideration is the child's independence. Ever since she was born, she has been striving to gain control of her body and organize her mind so that one day she will be able to function completely independently of her parents. This is a natural development, and is marked by important milestones such as crawling, walking, talking, and independent use of the toilet. This natural quest for independence will continue and manifest itself in new ways in the years to come. If we provide children with certain opportunities, this quest for independence can be smooth and exciting for both the child and her family. When starting school, there are some things we can do to make the process much easier in terms of the child's development and advancement of independence.

Emotional Independence

Young children have very strong attachments to their parents, and these attachments give them the structure and security necessary to venture out into the world. It is easy for parents to encourage toddlers to walk on their own or try out a new piece of apparatus at the park, because it is obvious the child is naturally drawn to this new venture, adding to her independence skills.

In addition to this kind of practice, it is important for children to have experiences where they can practice emotional independence. This can be accomplished by giving the child opportunities to stay in an environment with a familiar adult and another child or children before school begins. If the child has never experienced this, it is an important step that needs to be taken. Naturally, at first the child needs to be left for short periods of time, so that she can gain the confidence that she is capable of being without her mother or regular sitter. It is always important to be truthful with the child when leaving her, by telling her that you will be gone for a while, and return later. If the child goes into the situation not knowing that she will be left, then suddenly finds herself without her mother or sitter, she will be terrified and will not enjoy the stay or relish being left in new environments in the future. That is why it is so important to not sneak away, even if the child might become upset.

Even children who have been with sitters from babyhood need this experience. It helps them to broaden their horizons, and develop confidence in their own coping abilities. When they find that they can stay in other environments and have a good time, it will add positively to their emotional independence.

We can also prepare the child for emotional independence by telling her

the big, new world that they are entering.*

about her new school. If parents mention the fact that the child is going to school soon, mentioning some of the activities that will take place there in everyday conversation, the child will begin to prepare herself for this change. In these conversations, it is important to mention the names of her teachers as well as the names of any of the other children that she may know. In addition, parents can drive by the school on their regular errands and point out the building to the child, so she will be visually familiar with it. If possible, you can also stop by the building, allowing the child to walk through the grounds
