Quicksands B. M. Croker, 2022-11-24 Excerpt One sultry September afternoon some years ago my brother Ronald and I being tired and dusty found a temporary resting place on the parapet of a little old bridge that spanned a sleepy stream Through a thin silk blouse a comforting sun beat upon my back and I was serenely conscious of an unusual sense of happiness and well being though I owed little to my surroundings In all England it would have been difficult to find a more featureless and monotonous outlook than the prospect that lay stretched before us A series of flat marshy fields exhibiting here a space of willowy green and there a patch of black soil enclosed by ragged hedges or deep dark dykes Occasionally a few lonely and distorted trees or a humped up cluster of red roofs varied the scene which gradually faded until sky and horizon seemed to melt away into one pale blur What a region exclaimed Ronnie as he tossed away the stump of a cigarette
