

Ten-Minute Games: Consequences

Instructions

1. Each player has to draw 4 squares without being told into eight sections horizontally (or [fold the paper in half], then fold it and fold it again - from the paper and cut you should have eight horizontal sections).
2. The rest of the game is to take a story, writing words or phrases in them. At each step players fold over what they've written so you don't find out how the story goes until the end.
3. To start the game, each player writes a boy's name in the top section of the paper. They fold the paper over so no one can see what they've written. Then each child draws in the other player, or each player if there are more than two participants.
4. The rest of the story can be different - the writing in the brackets should be captured in whatever the player comes up with.
 - one girl's name
 - relation (place where they met)
 - the work (what he was)
 - the end (what she said)
 - he (what he did)
 - she (what she did)
 - the unexpected one (what happened)

1. Each player has a sheet of paper which they fold into eight sections horizontally i.e. fold the paper in half, then halve it and halve it again. Open the paper out and you should have eight horizontal sections.
2. The aim of the game is to tell a story, writing words or phrases in turn. At each step, players fold over what they've written so you don't find out how the story goes until the very end.
3. To start the game, each player writes a boy's name in the top section of the paper. They fold the paper over so no-one can see what they've written, then pass their sheet on to the other player, or next player if there are more than two participants.
4. The rest of the steps are as follows - the writing in the brackets should be replaced by whatever the player comes up with:
 - met (girl's name)
 - in/at/on (place where they met)
 - He said, (what he said)
 - She said, (what she said)
 - He (what he did)
