Overrun fuel cutoff

Smooth fuel cutoff effective during overrun responds as a function of the engine speed. The engine-speed information is provided by the ignition system. Intervention is via an air bypass around the sensor plate. A solenoid valve controlled by an electronic speed switch opens the bypass at a specific engine speed. The sensor plate then reverts to zero position and interrupts fuel metering. Cutoff of the fuel supply during overrun operation permits the fuel consumption to be reduced considerably not only when driving downhill but also in town traffic.

Engine speed limiting

The fuel supply can be cut off to limit the maximum permissible engine speed.

Lambda closed-loop control

Open-loop control of the air-fuel ratio is not adequate for observing extremely low exhaust-gas limit values. The lambda closed-loop control system required for operation of a three-way catalytic converter necessitates the use of an electronic control unit on the K-Jetronic. The important input variable for this control unit is the signal supplied by the lambda sensor.

In order to adapt the injected fuel quantity to the required air-fuel ratio with $\lambda = 1$, the
