LEGEND, folklore and black magic — the arts of mystery and darkness — have long been a special source of inspiration for artists, perhaps because their symbols are drawn from the roots of the imagination. One of the best examples is the work of Edgar Allan Poe, who mercilessly exposed the forbidden fantasies that drift near the ends of dreams. Composers, too, have probed into similar areas: Shostakovich's Yable Yable, Yable!, The Sorcerer's Apprentice, Bartók's Bluebeard's Castle and Mussorgsky's Night On The Bare Mountain are but a few of the better-known works attributable to magic, legends and folklore.

The collection of Wayne Shorter compositions included in Speak No Evil follows similar lines. "I was thinking," he explained to me, "of misty landscapes with wild flowers and strange, dimly-seen shapes — the kind of places where folklore and legends are born. And then I was thinking of things like witchburnings, too." Much of this feeling comes through in the compositions, especially in the floating harmonies, the chords filled with tonally disturbing ambiguities, about to move in one direction but sometimes stopping to float like the elements in Shorter's "misty landscapes." The effect is heightened by the remarkable interaction between Ron Carter and Elvin Jones. Little of what might specifically be called time-keeping occurs in what they play; rather, is there a flowing, sometimes overlapping, sometimes independent pulsation that shifts back and forth between superimposed metric subdivisions with the universe instead of just my own small corner of it." It is, particularly at a time when the expression of interior emotions is a focal point for many young players, a particularly refreshing statement.

"Whatever change I have made so far," Shorter explained, "is there inside me, churning around in a little circle, but still not revealing itself wholly. When I was doing this tape I was a struggle to get it out, to forget about the saxophone and its technical problems for an and abandon everything that I had done before." Like most of the short, painful steps that characterize artistic growth, Shorter's struggles do not always produce successful results. But when everything works, when the saxophone ceases to be a mechanism and becomes instead an extension of his voice (as frequently happens in this recording), the value of Shorter's goals becomes clear.

Witch Hunt makes extensive use of fourths in its line, which is fundamental and blues-like in style, but ethereal and haunting enough in execution to fully justify Shorter's title. Interestingly, all the soloists, first Shorter, then Hubbard and Hancock, use a fourth as a constructional motive in their improvisations. The second title, Fee Fi Fo Fum of course, is a continuation of the famous couplet spoken by the giant in the story of Jack and the Beanstalk. I doubt, however, if that monstrous creature ever swung through his castle with quite the elemental feeling the Shorter group achieves. Hubbard, who takes the first chorus, plays with plangent lyrics, but, characteristically, he varies chromatic chord change. Hancock's first chorus, gentle as a sunset, floats above the complex planes of interlocking rhythms played by Carter and Jones. Notice too how the returning melody blossoms out of Shorter's solo.

Both Hubbard and Shorter venture into unusual improvisational areas in their choruses on Speak No Evil. Shorter in particular seems interested in finding rhythmic and melodic ideas that are unbounded by traditional boundaries. Infant Eyes is the only line that departs from the ways of magic and folklore. "I was thinking of my daughter," said Shorter. The piece is constructed, in unorthodox fashion, of three consecutive nine bar phrases. Shorter plays throughout most of the track except for Hancock's introduction and brief nine-bar solo toward the end. Listen for the clear unaffected quality of Shorter's tenor sound, not unlike the velvety middle register sound of the cello. Wild Flower can be heard, according to Shorter, simply as what the title suggests — an Ode to a Wild Flower. It is a 6/4 tune, with a dancing, light-hearted line that probably will stay with you long after your phonograph is turned off. The soloists — Shorter, Hubbard and Hancock — play with distinction, and notice in particular the marvelous rhythmic cross-currents in their Jones' accompaniment. No small part of his talent lies in the ability to adapt to a given playing situation by finding an appropriate complimentary area of his own interpretive powers.
