

- Theory development requires a knowledge network because answers come only when theories can be tested by others. Some child development theorists did work together, but most did not have easy access to the theories of others.

No one theory has been adequate to describe the complexity of child development. The grand theories have given direction for more research. The research done by others may confirm (prove accurate) or disprove (show to be wrong or false) a theory, expand the theory, or apply the knowledge based on the theory to practice, such as education or child guidance. Research based on these grand theories is called mini theories. The works of some of the mini-theorists will be highlighted throughout the text.

Theory	Description
Maturational	Arnold Gesell (1880–1961) believed that physical and intellectual development was determined by heredity and biological maturation. His theory established many of the age norms and ideas about “readiness.”
Psychoanalytic	Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) believed personality (and mental health) was determined by how children coped with their physical drives. He examined how children regulate their desires and take on social norms. His theory was used primarily by psychiatrists.
Psychosocial	Erik Erikson (1902–1994) was concerned about conflicts that occur between a child’s needs and social demands. He believed that people who can cope with each conflict develop a healthy personality and vice versa. His theory is used in preventing and treating mental health problems.
Learning	Several theorists, including B.F. Skinner (1904–1990) and Albert Bandura (1925–present), focused on how the environments affect observable behaviors, not internal changes, such as personality and how you learn. They studied how behaviors can be reinforced (made stronger) or extinguished (stopped). Learning theories are mainly used in behavior modification or in intervention methods for children having learning or behavioral problems.
Cognitive-Developmental	Jean Piaget (1896–1980) believed children think differently at different ages. He thought children constructed (built) their knowledge through experiences. As children learn new ideas, their minds adapt (change). His theory totally changed child development.
Sociocultural	Lev Vygotsky (1896–1934) disagreed with Piaget’s theory that children totally construct their own knowledge. He believed that some knowledge was a personal construction, but much was a social construction (taught by people of one’s culture). His idea of mentoring or tutoring learning is used in many schools today.
Ecological Systems	Urie Bronfenbrenner (1917–2005) noted that children’s development is influenced by both heredity and their environment (family, friends, schools, and health services) as well as their indirect environment (parents’ workplaces and general culture). He also believed that children affect their environment, such as how they treat friends may affect their friendships. His theory has made people more aware of how the many contexts (systems) affect child development.

The New Kinship Naomi R. Cahn,2013-01-07 No federal law in the United States requires that egg or sperm donors or recipients exchange any information with the offspring that result from the donation Donors typically enter into contracts with fertility clinics or sperm banks which promise them anonymity The parents may know the donor s hair color height IQ college and profession they may even have heard the donor s voice But they don t know the donor s name medical history or other information that might play a key role in a child s development And until recently donor conceived offspring typically didn t know that one of their biological parents was a donor But the secrecy surrounding the use of donor eggs and sperm is changing And as it does increasing numbers of parents and donor conceived offspring are searching for others who share the same biological heritage When donors recipients and donor kids find each other they create new forms of families that exist outside of the law The New Kinship details how families are made and how bonds are created between families in the brave new world of reproductive technology Naomi Cahn a nationally recognized expert on reproductive technology and the law shows how these new kinship bonds dramatically exemplify the ongoing cultural change in how we think about family The issues Cahn explores in this book will resonate with anyone and everyone who has struggled with questions of how to define themselves in connection with their own biological legal or social families
