OBJECTIVE: The purpose of this study was to assess the efficacy and safety of duloxetine, a selective inhibitor of serotonin and norepinephrine reuptake, in the treatment of stress urinary incontinence.

STUDY DESIGN: A double-blind, randomized, placebo-controlled study was conducted in 553 women aged 18 to 65 years with a predominant symptom of stress urinary incontinence. Subjects were randomized to placebo ($n = 138$ women) or duloxetine at one of three doses (20 mg/d, $n = 138$ women; 40 mg/d, $n = 137$ women; or 80 mg/d, $n = 140$ women). Outcome variables that were assessed after 12 weeks of treatment included incontinence episode frequency recorded in a real-time diary and answers provided to the Patient Global Impression of Improvement scale and the Incontinence Quality of Life questionnaire.

RESULTS: Duloxetine was associated with significant and dose-dependent decreases in incontinence episode frequency that paralleled improvements that were observed in the Patient Global Impression of Improvement scale and the Incontinence Quality of Life questionnaire. The median incontinence episode frequency decrease with the use of the pooled diary analysis with placebo was 41% compared with 54% for duloxetine 20 mg per day ($P = .06$), 59% for duloxetine 40 mg per day ($P = .002$), and 64% for duloxetine 80 mg per day ($P < .001$). One half of the subjects at the 80 mg per day dose had a $\geq 64\%$ reduction in incontinence episode frequency ($P < .001$ vs placebo); 67% had $\geq 50\%$ reduction ($P = .001$ vs placebo). These improvements were observed despite significant concurrent dose-dependent increases in the average voiding interval in the duloxetine groups compared with the placebo group. Similar statistically significant improvements were demonstrated in a subgroup of 163 subjects who had more severe stress urinary incontinence (≥ 14 incontinence episode frequency per week; 49%–64% reduction in incontinence episode frequency in the duloxetine groups compared with 30% in the placebo group). Discontinuation rates for adverse events were 5% for placebo and 9%, 12%, and 15% for duloxetine 20, 40, and 80 mg per day, respectively ($P = .04$). Nausea was the most common symptom that led to discontinuation. None of the adverse events that were reported were considered to be clinically severe.

CONCLUSION: This trial provides evidence for the efficacy and safety of duloxetine as a pharmacologic agent for the treatment of stress urinary incontinence. (Am J Obstet Gynecol 2002;187:40–8.)

Numerous studies have implicated the neurotransmitters serotonin and norepinephrine in the central neural control of lower urinary tract function. Serotonergic agonists generally suppress parasympathetic activity and enhance sympathetic and somatic activity in the lower urinary tract, which are effects that promote urine storage; antagonists have the opposite effects.^{1–3} Electrical stimulation of the medullary raphe nuclei that contain the cell bodies of bulbospinal serotonergic neurons has been shown to inhibit reflex bladder contraction in cats,⁴ and there seem to be multiple sites of serotonergic modulation in the spinal cord.⁵ Noradrenergic agonists and antagonists also produce effects on sympathetic and somatic activity in the lower urinary tract, which is dependent on the adrenergic receptor subtype with which the agonists and antagonists interact.^{5–10}

On the basis of these potential continence-promoting properties of serotonin and norepinephrine, animal studies have been conducted with duloxetine hydrochloride, a combined norepinephrine and serotonin
