Light On Recovery:

Visual Recovery Times from High-intensity Flashes of Light Robert D. Metcalf, Richard E. Horn, 1958 A high intensity carbon arc was used as a light source to determine the course of visual recovery after exposure to a level of illumination comparable to that likely to be encountered during nuclear operations The subjects in the experiment were exposed to a source subtending 3 58 at the eye and with a luminance of up to 15 x 10⁶ foot lamberts Exposure time was constant at 0 1 second Recovery time plotted against illumination at the eye and source brightness produced a straight line curve in a semilog plot Extrapolation to the estimated burn threshold indicates a maximum recovery time of 170 seconds to discriminate a brightness contrast comparable to reading red lighted aircraft instruments Recovery times to other brightness levels are also indicated Abstract Stall Recovery and Stall Warning Instrumentation in a Light Airplane Phillip Justin Rulon, Kenneth W.
