Second edition, revised and enlarged William E. GIBBS (M.E.),1899 Lighting by Acetylene William E. Gibbs,2015-08-05 Excerpt from Lighting by Acetylene Generators Burners and Electric Furnaces When the first edition of this treatise was written in the months of January and February 1898 a host of acetylene generators was appearing New types and modifications of older forms were being put upon the market while hundreds were rushing into the new field opened by the production of calcium carbide The apparent simplicity of the gas making process from this new substance was sufficiently attractive to excite the interest of inventors generally and to develop a large number of worthless generators constructed by those having little mechanical knowledge and no ability to solve the difficulties encountered. The early machines were of the type originally known as briquet hydrogen now known as the plunger or dip generators. The next to appear were the dry generators so called in which water was sprinkled or dripped upon the carbide sometimes now called drip machines. These were an enormous step in advance of the plunging machine but with the overcoming of the earlier objections other corresponding difficulties were encountered and later when the wet process or chute generator was introduced it was thought that a great step in advance had been made.
