Like Roads:

Roads From the Ashes Megan Edwards, 2018-12-01 When a wildfire destroyed her home and worldly possessions in the hills above Los Angeles it didn't take Megan Edwards long to recognize an opportunity. It took her husband a little longer. Give me five minutes to grieve but they were both soon planning to make the most of their sudden stufflessness and hit the road. They did so a few months later in a freshly built four-wheel drive motorhome that was even more unusual because of the office in the back instead of a bedroom. This all happened back when the Internet had not yet entered the lexicon but email had. The mobile office would allow Edwards to file stories with the newspapers she wrote for by cell phone. That was the idea at least. At the beginning of 1994 cell service was patchy, unreliable, and expensive. They also thought they'd be traveling for six months or so when they believed they'd settle down and get back to normal. But five years and thousands of miles later they were still on the road. In that time they'd watched the Internet grow from a mysterious fad prized by people in remote locales into an unstoppable universal phenomenon. They started a website RoadTripAmerica.com to share road tripping tips and ideas. Slowly their dream of being at work at home and on the road all at the same grand time became a reality. This edition marks the twentieth anniversary of Edwards's memoir which was first released in 1999. At its heart a story of making lemonade when life gives you lemons, this memoir is also a riveting and at times hilarious look at the early years of the World Wide Web. With a new introduction by the author and a foreword by Chris Epting, enjoy an armchair adventure across North America when the Internet was young. This edition also includes 22 photos dating from when the author lived on the road.
