Steam and Hydronic Heating Systems

Steam and hydronic heating systems use water as a heat-transfer fluid. Water has a relatively high specific weight and specific heat, which make it an ideal water-transfer medium for carrying heat. Steam and hydronic heating systems heat water in a boiler at a central location. The steam or heated water is distributed through pipes going to buildings or rooms. In the building or room where the heat is required, the steam or hot water flows through terminal devices. The terminal devices transfer heat from the steam or hot water to the air of the building space. The steam or hot water is then either sent back to the central plant through return piping and condensers, or it is exhausted through exhaust piping and condensers.

STEAM AND HYDRONIC HEATING: THE DIFFERENCE

Most commercial and some residential buildings use steam or hot water systems to supply the required heat. Buildings located in colder climates use steam supply the needs of hot water. There are almost advantages and disadvantages to each type of system. Water carries less BTU per degree than steam and needs all water while steam carries 419 BTU for every pound of steam that condenses back into liquid. A heating unit that circulates water has to heat all of the water coming out of the unit before going into a room. Steam systems rely on the difference in pressure to move the steam through the pipes through piping or radiators. Heating water when the steam goes up the back in a condenser back into a liquid, and then the condensate is pumped back to the boiler through return piping. In a hot water heating system the heated water is distributed in a circulating pipe through supply piping to heating units and returned to the water re-circulating.

A central plant is to use a combination of equipment from which a source of heat and hot water and processing units of a commercial building. In the hot water system a boiler is used to produce the steam required by building processes.

Water is all of the water needed to heat the building is pumped to a heat exchanger to heat water. The hot water is then circulated through the building until the supply and return piping to heat building return off.

STEAM HEATING VS HOT WATER

A steam heating system is a heating system that uses steam to carry heat from the point of generation to the point of use. Steam heating systems are used because steam carries more BTU per pound of steam than water. Piping doesn't have to be used where there is a limited amount of space. In the distribution system, another advantage to steam heating systems is that the condensate that is produced in the heating unit is not heated to a point that there is a difference in pressure from one area (pressure point) area (heat loss area). The boiler is located in a central plant and the steam is distributed in individual buildings or rooms throughout the building. See Figure 3-1.

In individual buildings the boiler is usually located in the lower floor of a building, usually the basement or mechanical room. In the hot water system of heating the boiler is where it is to be
